Impossible quiz 2 answer 28

Keep up to date with the latest daily buzz with the BuzzFeed Daily newsletter! @harperandharley No matter how confident you are, composed and qualified, there is something nervous about a job interview that can rattle even those at the top of their field. It's like meeting high-stakes people. You have a matter of minutes to impress the person you are dating, and you know that every gesture and word is closely observed. If you're struggling with nerves, leadership adviser Dana White says there's a way to increase your chance of success: Research, preparation and practice of voice issues. As chief adviser to CEOs and U.S. senators and author of Leader Designed: Become the Leader You Were Made to Be, White is a master of writing speeches and reading the people around her - two skills that are vital to turning an interview into an offer. Here she tackles the questions that would cause any candidate to squirm and explains why her approach can get you into the job. Think of it as a word-for-word guide to the five most difficult questions to interview. - No, no, no, no, you took it. Original illustration by Stephanie DeAngelis Repeat After: I'm here because I'm excited about the idea of growth and development in a position, I think I can add considerable experience and perspective as the company moves forward. Here's why: The key to perfecting this response is focusing on positivity and what you wear in the role, not why work can help you. It's so important to express the excitement and positivity at the beginning of the interview, White said. People ultimately want to work with those who are interesting or challenging, not someone who just has to pay the bills. Her tip? Pepper words like excited, opportunity, grow, and develop in response. If this question makes you uncomfortable, White also stresses that it's important to ask yourself why. I think this question reveals a lot about the interviewer, she says. It's hostile and makes you wonder if I want to be here today? Remember that this is an opportunity to learn about the employer as well, and to assess whether the company is right for you. Original illustration by Stephanie DeAngelis I repeat After Us: I would rather be respected. In every country of life, being afraid of you is ultimately bad for you. Being a successful manager or even a colleague requires working together and developing trust and transparency. If anyone is afraid of you, they will hide things that are made worse for the overall mission. Here's why: This question reveals your true character, so it's extremely important to answer with sincerity and consider what it says about you. Your character is what sets you apart, White explains. A lot of people have gone to great schools or have relationships - maybe even better than yours. It's a chance to show what kind of colleague or employee you're going to be. That's what interviewers want to invest in. Original illustration by I repeat after us: Where does a sheep cut its wool? In a ba-ba-shop! I know some much better jokes, but I think they are better said after working together closely together! Here's why: This terrifying interview question tests how you think under pressure and whether you have a sense of humor. White says it's important to try to show that you can laugh at yourself, even if you don't know any big jokes. It's really hard, but it's very indicative of your personality and ability to deal with awkward situations, she says. It doesn't matter what kind of joke it is, as long as it's not dirty or too personal, just try it. If you don't have a joke, be cheeky and tell them you'll share it once you get to know each other better. Original illustration by Stephanie DeAngelis I repeat after us: The worst manager I've ever had was one who couldn't help me grow up. Although they wanted more responsibilities and ways in which I could evolve, I was neglected, and it made me feel discouraged because I enjoyed the position and the company, but they seemed unable to channel my energies. Here's why: React with caution - this question lures you to bait employers or reveal your own shortcomings. It's important to stay on board, but you answer honestly and honestly. After all, you wouldn't be looking for another job if you were great, White says. This answer reveals that you are impatient and want to know. This shows that this manager can give you more responsibility. Original illustration by Stephanie DeAngelis Repeat After: I think I deserve a salary that is consistent with the level of responsibility this role requires. I have looked at positions like this and I can see that my experience as a manager [bring my strengths here] would be an asset and should be reflected in the proposal. Here's why: The salary question is difficult enough, but this show is especially difficult because it provokes an emotionally motivated response. White says the best way to respond is to show that you're aware of the industry's standard salary for the role, then use it as an opportunity to outline the skills that put you above that metric. Deserving is a very loaded term, [but] just because someone asks doesn't mean you have to answer straight, she says. Instead, it focuses on building your case and when it comes to talking numbers, come prepared with facts about a competitor's wages. It takes away the awkward inconvenience and is a stronger place to negotiate. Image: Yuri_Arcurs/E+/Getty Images There are too many branches of knowledge to list them all, and knowledge comes in all forms and forms. A doctor may be knowledgeable in neurosurgery, and a farmer can be knowledgeable in weather conditions. The chimpanzee may know the most effective way to peel a banana, and the engineer may know the most effective way to build a bridge. There are so many things to it is impossible to teach them all. Very few people learn a square root of 289, the capital of Australia, Australia, A northern star, the deepest place on Earth and the weight of Manhattan at the same time. Very few people learn such a wide variety of knowledge at different times. And that's why it's impossible to know everything. Fortunately, this test is almost impossible. If you dig deep and try to remember everything you have ever learned in this history of your training, you may be able to get every question right for this test. You'll need to take your social lessons from years ago and combine them with the common sense on the street you learn today to get these questions right, but that can be done. Do you think you can do that? Put your skills to the test and try to answer these almost impossible knowledge questions. Exact answer: 3,000 calories according to the Calorie Control Tip, a turkey and garnish dinner is not devoid of calories or fat. If we don't make wise choices, we can easily eat as many as 3,000 calories at a festive dinner. 2. How many extra calories does the average person's breakfast make before and after? Exact answer: 1,500 calories We can bite off and drink another 1,500 calories (the same number of calories that many while the Philadelphia Eagles are trying to make mince meat from the Arizona Cardinals). Our total daily calories for Thanksgiving may be enough to last us more than two days, and we can eat enough fat on that day to last nearly four days. Instead, go on holiday with a game plan: Eat a meal and stuff breakfast or lunch, depending on how long the big food is served - and resist the urge to pout aimlessly throughout the day and during the preparation of the meal. 3. Eating 3 1/2-ounce, serving white meat turkey without skin shaves how many fat grams - mostly saturated - from the main course? Exact answer: 8.5 grams Turkey is one of the lowest calorie and weakest sources of protein - if you do not eat the skin. A serving of roast white meat has only 157 calories and 3 grams of fat. Dark meat without skin has only 187 and 7 grams of fat. However, dark meat with skin has a huge amount of 11.5 grams of fat (almost 3 tablespoons of fat), and more than 3.5 grams of it are heart-stopping saturated fat. 4. Which side dish is the safest bet in seconds? Correct answer: Green beans cooking When in doubt, pile your plate with non-starch vegetable cooking. A cup of sweet potatoes or mashed potatoes will count over 325 calories from your diet, while a roasted cabbage is a calorie deal at 145 calories per cup. Is it even better? Enjoy roasted or steamed vegetables this holiday and skip the added butter or cream-based sauces in which you often stew our vegetables. 5. Which alcoholic beverage is best for your waistline? Correct answer: Light beer or club soda. One shot of any alcohol is only 80 calories. 6. If you're looking at calories, which festive pie is the best? The right answer: Pumpkin squash is the thinnest pie option around and one of the healthiest desserts because it's full of beta-carotene, fiber and lots of vitamins and minerals. A slice (1/8 of a 9-inch pie) has 325 calories, compared to 355 in a piece of apple and 455 in a piece of walnut. To reduce calories even further, look for pie crusts made with oats or graham crackers instead of shortening or butter crusts. Bark.
